I miss the daily phone calls! I would answer and Brian would say "doctor" and I responded doctor. This went on for years. We would talk about our daily struggles and just whatever came up while he was in the truck or I would call if I was driving somewhere. Brian always said to me with that big smile on your face "watch what you wish for" when I was complaining about work. It always made it better because by him saying that he meant he's been through it and it will work itself out. You will be missed Brian! Till we meet again! Rest in peace!

My dad showed me how to work hard and put the ones you care about in your life first. I grew up doing side jobs with him on the weekends. I never liked it. I didn't have too much of a choice, and he would pay me, so I eventually learned to appreciate it. It still made me go to college for computer science because I realized I didn't want to do that all the time, it sucked. But he did that all the time. And he never complained about it. He wanted to make sure we were taken care of and was proud of his work. He was able to send us to private high school and make sure we were set up to succeed. He was really good at it too. He has this amazing way of seeing a big picture and just knowing what to do next to get it done. I felt like he could fix and build anything. And he did, from bathrooms, to basements, kitchens, everything. I realized when I graduated I could use this nepotism. I wanted to buy a duplex and live in it while I fixed it up. I'm cheap and I realized you win in real estate when you do everything yourself, so I pitched the idea to my dad. He was fully on board. I said you can be the brains, I'll be the mule, just tell me what to do and I want to learn. So for the next 20ish months, we showed up to the duplex I bought, and gutted/replaced the entire house. We did floors, ceilings, walls, electrical, plumbing, everything. For just about every weekend and some weekdays, him and I got to spend a lot of time and hours together putting our souls into this place. I didn't know what I had gotten into but I loved it. He was so good at just knowing what to do. I cherish every one of those days with him, he was always on time and sometimes I'd be hungover and struggling but really living in it. I plan to keep that house as long as I can. I told him before we let him go I will always feel you there, and I will. Having that time with him is invaluable and I will love and miss him. I'm looking forward to just sitting in that house when I can and feeling everything we put into it. I told him we will always be connected. He lived through us and I want to share this story to illustrate how he taught me what grit is growing up. I will carry that with me forever and know how to work hard when life is hard, and how to take care of my family when life isn't easy. May he rest in peace.
